Limited admission shelters only accept animals when they have the space and resources to do so, and often have a waiting list. Open admission shelters are mandated to accept every animal that comes through their doors. Some also serve as their city's municipal shelter, meaning they only accept pets from local residents. A city's municipal shelter also serves as that area's animal control, run by its government. All shelters in Colorado may euthanize for extreme health concerns and/or poor quality of life, but each work to find a loving home for the vast majority of animals in their care, often transferring animals they can't help to other shelters. We recommend calling to ask about their policies and if they are currently accepting cats into their facility.

We believe that in most situations, the best approach for feral or community cats is TNR. In some cases, placement into a barn or working cat program can be beneficial.
